Day 3 - Cormorant Point & Baroness

Duration

5 Days

Location

This morning promises a wet landing on a Galapagos Islands, Ecuador with an aromatic pine peninsula adorned with an aromatic palo santo forest. The beach's unique green hue is a testament to the high percentage of glassy olivine crystals, remnants of the surrounding tuff cones. As you cross to the other side, a 'flour sand' beach awaits, created by coral pulverized by the diligent Parrotfish. Keep your eyes peeled for schools of stingrays, gracefully burying themselves in the sandy bottom. If you're here during the first months of the year, witness the awe-inspiring sight of Pacific green turtles coming ashore to bury their eggs. In the afternoon, while you savor a delicious lunch, we navigate to Post Office Bay, a historical site intermittently in use since the eighteenth century when the Galapagos served as a resupplying port for Pacific pirates. Embrace the tradition by sending greeting cards worldwide through the historical barrel that remarkably still works. On the nearby beach, expect the delightful presence of sea lions, Pacific green turtles, golden rays, and perhaps even penguins. Continue your exploration by climbing the miniature basaltic cone of Baroness Lookout, where paradisiacal coastal views await. This viewpoint was the cherished spot of one of Floreana's first modern-era colonists, the eccentric Baroness and 'Empress of Galapagos,' Eloisa von Wagner Bosquet. Intriguingly, her house stands a few meters behind, marking the site of mysterious disappearances and deaths during the enigmatic 1930s.

World for birdwatchers. Different kinds of Galapagos Islands, Ecuador

Fringes, frigates, blue-footed boobies and Nazca boobies can be found, as well as the endemic Española mockingbird, Albatross, and Galapagos hawk. Watch your step, because each Albatross' couple lay an egg on the floor and make it roll over to improve hatching success. The juveniles attend the cliffs of the island to learn to fly by jumping into the abysm. And the chicks are organized in nurseries where they will safely remain while the adults are away at sea. Another highlight during this visit is “El Soplador”, a 25 m water geiser produced by ocean waves crashing with great pressure with cracks in the island’s cliff, spouting up through a lava tunnel. This site offers a fantastic background for a meditative experience or a memorable photo. This afternoon we will keep exploring Española island, the oldest in the archipelago, estimated at over 4 million years old, located in the extreme southeast of the archipelago. On the north-eastern coast of this island, Gardner Bay offers a wonderful place to refresh in the turquoise sea and to snorkel side by side with eagle rays, golden rays, barracudas, batfish, turtles, sea lions, and white tipped sharks.
